DALLAS, TX., Mar. 16, 2008 – The First American Corporation, (NYSE: FAF), America's largest provider of business information, today announced that it has made a donation of $10,000 to aid the non-profit, Children and Community Health Center of McKinney, Texas.

The donation, made through First American's Community Relations Group, will assist the center in providing pediatric and adult medical care for uninsured residents in the McKinney area.

The donation is part of First American's ongoing dedication to assisting local communities and was made possible through corporate and employee donation drives held throughout the year and through events such as the annual First American Charity Golf Classic held near Dallas which is now in its ninth year.

"The Health Center plays such a crucial role in the quality of life, and quality of care, for those unable to afford medical treatment in the area," said Lewis Hill, executive vice president of First American's Community Relations Group. "The Center runs on a simple premise – provide care for everyone who needs it, regardless of ability to pay. I am proud that First American can play a significant role in the Center's continuing service to the community and in the important work of all of the organizations we provide assistance for."

The Children and Community Health Clinic provides healthcare to children and adults free of charge without regard to race, ethnicity, religion, or nationality. The only requirement is that the patient must be unable to access healthcare services through the traditional fee-for-service delivery system. The Center is staffed by volunteer doctors and has assisted more than 3,600 patients since opening in 2004.

"We thank First American for the generous support of our clinic and our work with uninsured parents and their children," said Mary Nelle Cummins, founder of the Children and Community Health Center. "Through the efforts of First American, a company that takes such an active role in our community, we will continue to serve those in need."
